Background

Culturally, he's a suburban white boy, born and raised in the suburbs of Annapolis. He attended university down in College Park, went to med school at Hopkins, and has a large, diverse family. The exact manner of how he acquired his power is still something of a mystery.

While he one day hopes to be accepted into one of the big league supers groups, he won't complain if it doesn't happen. He's more than happy to protect his own.

Important NPC

His younger brother, Michael, star reporter for the Baltimore Sun. See, Michael has suspicions that his brother, Allen, is the superhero Bluestreak, and he'd like to prove it. Allen, fearing for the safety of his family, donned the mask to hide his identity and does all he can to keep Michael from finding out the truth. See, he and Allen got into a big fight a few years back and never fully reconciled. While Allen does not hold anything against his brother anymore, Michael still has something of a grudge. It doesn't help Allen that he is disinclined toward superhero types in the first place, and he'd love nothing better than to expose the Baltimore group as the evildoers that they really are (after all, they're led by that convicted mobster, Legs). Michael is good person at heart, but is very short-sighted and narrow minded.

Why are you a Hero?

A couple of incidents turned his life around. In college, he witnessed a battle between the DC supers group and a pack of supervillains that spilled over onto the College Park campus. His dorm building was destroyed in the ensuing climactic battle. Many people were seriously hurt. It gave him first-hand experience at how helpless normal people could be against the might of supers and led him to the path of a medical doctor.

When he one day realized that he had the super speed, he figured he was being given a chance to help out in another way and he has tried to take full advantage of that.
